Abstract

Atheism is defined as the belief that there is no God or gods. 'What is atheism?' is one which does not make the mistake of thinking that atheism can be essentially negative about a whole range of beliefs other than theism, but is indifferent rather than hostile to religious belief. They can be more concerned with attuned to natural beauty than many theists. There is no more reason for the religious to be so.

Abstract

Atheism is defined as the belief that there is no God or gods. 'What is atheism?' aims to provide a positive view of atheism, one which does not make the mistake of thinking that atheism can only exist as a parasitic rival to theism, or that atheism is essentially negative about a whole range of beliefs other than those concerning God's existence. Atheists can be indifferent rather than hostile to religious belief. They can be more sensitive to aesthetic experience, more moral, or more attuned to natural beauty than many theists. There is no more reason for them to be pessimistic or depressive than there is for the religious to be so.

I do not feel I bear any deep scars brought on by the mild form of indoctrination practised there, where beliefs were instilled by constant repetition and reinforcement rather than any overt coercion. Indeed, in many ways the power the Church exerted over me was very weak. When I moved to a non-Catholic secondary school I soon moved over to Methodism, and by the time I left school I had given up religious belief altogether. I had become an atheist - a person who believes there is no God or gods.
